Creating Long Panels using Census Data: 1961-2001

Hemanshu Kumar Rohini Somanathan*

November 2016

Abstract

Indian data are mostly published at the state or district level. Multi-year analyses of these data are made difficult by the many changes in state and district boundaries that have occurred since the first comprehensive census of independent India in 1961. Between 1961 and 2001, the number of states and union territories in India increased from 26 to 35, and the number of districts increased from 339 to 593. There were several changes in both names and boundaries. We document these changes and use them to construct regions of amalgamated districts with constant boundaries. There are 232 such regions for the entire period 1961-2001. These can be used to construct panel data sets that cover this forty-year period.

1 Introduction

Official data in India are mostly published at two levels: the state, and below it, the district. Multi-year analyses of these data are made difficult by the many changes in state and district boundaries that have occurred since the first comprehensive census of independent India in 1961. Between 1961 and 2001, the number of states and union territories in India increased from 26 to 35, and the number of districts increased from 339 to 593. There were changes in both names and boundaries. We document these changes and use them to construct regions of amalgamated districts with constant boundaries. There are 232 such regions for the entire period 1961-2001. These can form the basis of multi-year panels of Indian district data.

The Indian federal structure consists of states, which have elected governments, and centrally administered union territories. Early changes in state boundaries after Independence aimed at creating coherent linguistic and cultural units within a federal structure. More recent changes have resulted from a combination of identity-based mass movements within existing states and political responses to them at strategic stages during electoral cycles. District changes occurred initially to absorb the many princely states and later as a means to expand government as populations grew. Many excellent accounts of these changes are available (Tillin, 2013; Chandra, 2007). We restrict ourselves here to their practical implications for users of Indian data.

In previous work published in Kumar and Somanathan (2009), we documented district-level boundary changes between 1971 and 2001. Here we build upon this work in three ways: we extend the ambit of analysis back by another decade. Second, we include changes in state names and boundaries since many of these took place during 1961-71. Finally, we create collections of amalgamated districts which can be used for panel data analysis over the forty year period and display these on a map.

As before, we use information from the volumes on the General Population Tables (Part II-A), published in the Census of India rounds from 1961 through 2001. In particular, Appendix 1 to Table A-1 and the Appendix to Table A-2 in the General Population Tables contain information on the area and population of each state and district as per its current boundaries, as well as the population in the previous census adjusted to current boundaries. The footnotes to the Appendix to Table A-2 specify the individual transfers between affected states and districts, along with details of the government notification that effected the transfer.

The next section details changes in state names and boundaries. The following section focuses on the districts, which we divide into three sets: those with unchanged boundaries, clean partitions of existing districts, and all the rest. We end with a map of the 232 regions that can be used to create panels of data that have been published at the district level.

2 The States

At the end of colonial rule in 1947, India inherited a map of administrative divisions that had been “shaped by the military, political or administrative exigencies or conveniences of the moment... with small regard to the natural affinities or wishes of the people.” (Government of India, 1918, p. 28, para 39)

When the Constitution was adopted in 1950, the roughly 560 former princely states had been integrated with the rest of the country and all states were arranged in one of four categories, A through D with varying degrees of autonomy from the federal government.¹ The States Reorganization Act of 1956 altered state boundaries for greater linguistic coherence and created the state map that was in place at the time of the 1961 census. The four-fold division of states was replaced by a two-fold classification of states and union territories.

Three types of changes affected state boundaries after 1961. First, new states were created from the partitioning of existing states. This occurred mainly in the first and last of the four decades we consider. Second, some union territories received state status and some states changed names. Finally, there were small territorial transfers across existing states.

Several states and union territories witnessed no such changes between 1961 and 2001: Andaman and Nicobar Islands, Andhra Pradesh, Dadra and Nagar Haveli, Gujarat, Jammu and Kashmir, Kerala, Maharashtra, Orissa, Pondicherry, Rajasthan, and West Bengal. We discuss the rest below and summarize the changes in Table 1.

2.1 New states

In the sixties and early seventies, new states were created in north and north-east India. This was part of the move to reorganize states into a new federal structure after Independence.

The Punjab Reorganization Act, 1966 led to the creation of the state of Haryana and a union territory of Chandigarh. A part of Punjab was also merged with the union territory of Himachal Pradesh to form the state of Himachal Pradesh.²

Meghalaya was created from portions of Assam in 1969.³ The North-Eastern Areas (Reorganization) Act of 1971 modified the boundaries of Meghalaya and also created the union territory of Mizoram on 21 January 1972 out of the Mizo hills area of Assam.⁴ In our tables, we follow the census convention of treating Mizoram as a separate entity only from the Census of 1981, while Meghalaya is treated as a state starting with the Census of 1971.

In the eighties, the union territory of Goa, Daman and Diu in western India was partitioned into the state of Goa and the union territory of Daman and Diu.⁵

There were major changes in 2000, when three new states were created. Chhattisgarh was carved out of Madhya Pradesh in November 2000,⁶ the hill districts of Uttar Pradesh became Uttaranchal,⁷ and southern Bihar became Jharkhand.⁸

2.2 Changes in nomenclature and status

Once the southern states had been reorganised along linguistic lines, their names were changed to reflect their linguistic identity. The state of Madras was renamed Tamil Nadu in 1968 and Mysore was renamed Karnataka in 1973.⁹

The union territory of Laccadive, Minicoy and Amindivi Islands was changed to Lakshadweep, also in 1973.¹⁰

At the time of the Census of 1961, the North East Frontier Agency was administered directly by the President of India through the Governor of Assam. The North-Eastern Areas (Reorganization) Act, 1971 this region became the union territory of Arunachal Pradesh in 1972. It is listed as such in the Census 1971 volumes. Arunachal Pradesh as well as Mizoram acquired statehood in February 1987.¹¹

Several other changes of status also occurred in the 1960s and early 1970s in the north-eastern parts of the country. The former princely states of Manipur and Tripura had become union territories under the States Reorganisation Act of 1956, and acquired full statehood in January 1972.¹² They are treated as states starting from the census of 1971. Nagaland became a state in December 1963.¹³ It was treated as a union territory in the census of 1961, and as a state from 1971 onwards.

Sikkim became a full state of the Indian union according to the Constitution (Thirty-sixth Amendment) Act, 1975. Its census however was being conducted by India in previous waves as well. It is counted as a union territory in the census of 1961, and as a state thereafter. (Government of India, 1975, pp. 40–41)

The union territory of Delhi was renamed as the National Capital Territory of Delhi by the Constitution (Sixty-ninth Amendment) Act, 1991. Unlike other union territories however, it has a legislative assembly and therefore an intermediate status. It continues to be listed as a union territory in Census documents.

2.3 Small inter-state territorial transfers

There are a few instances of minor alterations to state boundaries, usually made to correct for geographical anomalies.

In two cases, boundaries that earlier fluctuated with changes in the course of rivers, were sought to be made permanent. The Bihar and Uttar Pradesh (Alteration of Boundaries) Act 1968 fixed boundaries affected by changes in the flow of the Ganga and Ghagra rivers.¹⁴ Similarly, the Haryana and Uttar Pradesh (Alteration of Boundaries) Act 1979 fixed state boundaries affected by changes in the course of the river Yamuna.¹⁵ Both these boundary adjustments affected tiny fractions of the state populations.

A third instance involved a small uninhabited area measuring just 0.03 sq. km. that was transferred from Mysore state to Andhra Pradesh in 1968.¹⁶ This area had been overlooked earlier, when enclaves of the erstwhile native states were merged into their neighboring provinces by the Provinces and States (Absorption of Enclaves) Order of 1950.

3 District boundaries

Tables 2 through 4 summarize the way district jurisdictions were altered between 1961 and 2001. We focus our discussion on changes in the 1961-71 decade since later years have been covered in our earlier paper.

In contrast to the many changes in state boundaries described above, few district boundaries were altered between 1961 and 1971. As Table 2 shows, India consisted of 339 districts at the time of Census 1961,¹⁷ a number that increased by just 5 per cent to 356 in 1971. The boundaries of over three-quarters of the 1961 districts remained unchanged over this decade (Table 3). Madhya Pradesh was the only large state that had no district boundary changes. Most of the changes in district boundaries were concentrated in areas that were affected by the reorganization of states.

As discussed in Kumar and Somanathan (2009), we create units for a panel data set by amalgamating districts into composite regions with no inter-regional transfers. These are generated by placing each parent district in the same region as all its child districts. This is very straightforward in cases where new districts have been created by partitioning existing ones. For instance, Dharmapuri district was created in 1965 from four taluks of the Salem district of Tamil Nadu (then called Madras state). In this case, the boundaries of Salem district in 1961 represent a region with consistent boundaries between 1961 and 1971.

A more complex case is that of Ramanathapuram district, also in Tamil Nadu. Two villages of this district were transferred to Madurai district in July 1961. To create a geographical unit with consistent boundaries, for use in a panel from 1961 to 1971, we combine the districts of Ramanathapuram and Madurai into a single region.

Table 5 summarizes the number of consistent regions obtained in this manner, between a given census year and 2001. For the 1961-2001 period, there are a total of 232 such regions that span the entire country. We list these regions in Table 6 and depict them on a map in Figure 1, along with the boundaries of the component districts as per Census 2001.

When constructing these regions, we account for all inter-district transfers that involve inhabited regions, however small. Some of these transfers, such as the one between Ramanathapuram and Madurai above, are easily overlooked when using coarser methods such as the examination of administrative maps. This approach results in some regions that are much larger than those derived from these visual methods. For example, the largest region with consistent boundaries between 1961 and 2001 is an amalgamation of 52 Census 2001 districts. These cut across the boundaries of Punjab, Haryana, Himachal Pradesh, Chandigarh, and Uttar Pradesh. If we ignore transfers that involved less than 5 per cent of the population of the parent district, this same geographical area would instead be divided into 10 regions with consistent boundaries between 1961 and 2001, and the number of such regions for the whole country would rise to 290.

4 Conclusion

In this paper, we built upon previous work in Kumar and Somanathan (2009) to track district and state-level boundary changes from the Census of 1961 till 2001. Our findings are encouraging for those interested in constructing long panels of district-level data. In particular, while there were a large number of changes in the boundaries of the Indian states in the 1960s and early 1970s, the administrative boundaries of districts were relatively undisturbed in this period.

Our analysis uses detailed information on inter-district population transfers available in census documents. We use a strict definition for boundary changes: a district's jurisdiction is considered to be unchanged if there was no transfer of any inhabited area across its boundaries. The underlying data permits a more flexible approach: we may wish to ignore boundary changes involving small transfers.

To enable researchers to construct regions as per their requirements, we provide detailed information on district changes in Tables 7 - 9. Table 7 lists districts that remained unchanged over the entire forty year period. Table 8 lists districts that were partitioned over this period, including the population fraction of the parent district that went to each child. Table 9a - 9d provide details on the remaining districts. For each intercensal decade, we provide the population of the parent district, the population share of the parent district that went to each child, and the population share of each parent in a child district.

At the time of writing, the General Population Tables on which our analysis relies, have not been published for the Census of 2011. We hope to incorporate these changes once these are available.

Notes

1. The former British provinces became Part A states under the new constitution. Part B states were a result of integration of princely states, and had a Raj Pramukh who was the former ruler of a princely state. The ten Part C states were often erstwhile Chief Commissioner's provinces, and were administered centrally. The Andaman and Nicobar Islands were the sole area under Part D. (Sharma, 1995, p. 68)
2. This was done following the State of Himachal Pradesh Act, 1970.
3. The Assam Reorganization (Meghalaya) Act 1969.
4. See Government of India (1975, pp. 39–40).
5. By the Goa, Daman and Diu Reorganization Act, 1987.
6. By the Madhya Pradesh Reorganization Act, 2000.
7. This was under the Uttar Pradesh Reorganization Act of November 2000. The name of the state was subsequently changed to Uttarakhand by the Uttaranchal (Alteration of Name) Act, 2006 (No. 52 of 2006). Census 2001 documents refer to the state as Uttaranchal, so we follow this convention.
8. By the Bihar Reorganization Act, 2000. (Government of India, 2005, pp. 148, 151 & 161)
9. By the Madras State (Alteration of Name) Act, 1968 and the Mysore State (Alteration of Name) Act, 1973 respectively.
10. By the Laccadive, Minicoy and Amindivi Islands (Alteration of Name) Act, 1973 (Government of India, 1975, p. 41).
11. By the State of Arunachal Pradesh Act, 1986 (No. 69 of 1986) and the State of Mizoram Act, 1986 (No. 34 of 1986), respectively.

12. By the North-Eastern Areas (Reorganization) Act, 1971.
13. As notified by the Nagaland (Transitional Provision) Regulation, 1961.
14. The Bihar and Uttar Pradesh (Alteration of Boundaries) Act, 1968 led to the transfer of 99 villages from the district of Shahabad in Bihar to Ballia in Uttar Pradesh, while 44 villages were transferred from Ballia to the districts of Shahabad and Saran in Bihar. The net change involved a population transfer of 8,153 persons from Bihar to Uttar Pradesh, which comprised less than 0.02% of either state's population. (Government of India, 1975, p. 136).
15. In 1983, vide Government Notification No. GSR-702E, there was a transfer involving 18 villages with a population of 490 persons and an area of 27.19 sq. km, from Faridabad district of Haryana to Ghaziabad and Bulandshahr districts of Uttar Pradesh. (Government of India, 1994, p. 157)
16. This area was transferred from Kolar district of Mysore state to Anantapur district of Andhra Pradesh, as a result of the Andhra Pradesh and Mysore (Transfer of Territory) Act, 1968.
17. This count excludes Sikkim, which became a part of the country only in 1975.

Note:

1. Portions of two villages, with unknown population and a total area of 0.73 sq km, were transferred from Gandhinagar district to Ahmadabad district between 1981 and 1991.
2. This work relies on Haryana population transfers listed in Statement 1 (p. 118) and the Appendix to Table A-2 published in Government of India (1996). These figures do not include some small transfers that are listed in Appendix 1 to Table A-1. Thus the weights we have listed for Haryana districts (except Sirsa and Bhiwani) are approximate.
3. An uninhabited portion of one village, with an area of 0.04 sq km, was transferred from Tirucchirappalli district to Pasumpon M. Thevar district between 1981 and 1991.
